I found my voice when I was 15.

I walked into my local Planned Parenthood and demanded to know why I didn't see girls who looked like me in their brochures or on their Teen Council. That early moment of asking hard questions and speaking my truth inspired me to work for reproductive justice and social change in Oregon.

This passion for storytelling is a continuous thread in my career and a key part of my work at MRG Foundation. Our work is rooted in funding, fueling, amplifying, and supporting community-based organizing across the state so that, together, we can create strong voices for social change.

MRG funds voices calling for change across Oregon. Over the past year, we've continued to elevate the stories of our grantees and throughout this report you will hear from dedicated activists like Laura, Khalil, Duncan, and others who are doing incredible work in our communities — work you helped fund through your support of MRG Foundation!

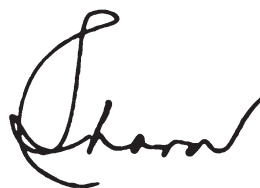

MRG uses its voice to push for political change. For the first time in our 40-year history, MRG endorsed a ballot measure. Measure 88 would have ensured all Oregonians, regardless of documentation, access to our roads to get to school and work safely. It also served as an important opportunity to elevate critical immigrant rights issues.

MRG listens to the voices of our grantees. After hearing from movement leaders about the critical need for responsive and accessible capacity building, we initiated an innovative partnership with the Meyer Memorial Trust to launch the Capacity Building Initiative. Through the CBI, we will be working with a cohort of ten grassroots groups to build their organizational leadership and help them reach their growth goals!

As we move forward into MRG's 40th year, I am bolstered by the evidence — in this report and in our communities — that our funding and support is yielding results. But we can't do it alone. MRG's voice joins those of activists, donors, community members, and philanthropy leaders to inspire Oregon's social justice movement.

Whether you are new to MRG, or a long-time supporter, I invite you to share your voice. I know that together you and I can be bold, innovative, and supportive of grassroots organizing to build a more inclusive Oregon for all.

My motto is to be in service to others. Whatever type of work I do, I want to be in service to the community. My work as the Co-Director of PFLAG-Portland Black Chapter allows me to use activism to be in service to a community that is tied to the person I am, a person with intersecting identities.

PFLAG-PBC provides a voice to a community that finds strength in all of their identities and uses that strength to further the social and racial justice movement. In 2014, we stepped into a leadership role in the Freedom to Marry campaign with Oregon United for Marriage. We did this by galvanizing the Black community to address the racial wedge too often used by opponents of same sex marriage to undermine social and racial justice movements. We brought a new voice to the conversation, and intersectionality and inclusion to the movement.

MRG's funding has made it possible for us to realize our vision and stretch to become a Black LGBTQ organization that works at the intersections of oppression. It has also allowed us to do our work authentically, without having to shift our programming to follow the money.

Co-Director, PFLAG Portland Black Chapter, Portland

We bring a new voice to the conversation...

I have been in the struggle alongside my community...

Laura Isiordia on building leaders who are most impacted by injustice.

For centuries, my community has been colonized. Being part of an oppressed community I've been told to think of myself as just another statistic. I have worked to dismantle this internalized colonization and now define myself as a survivor of domestic violence, former farmworker, proud single parent, and community leader.

At times, it was hard for me to fully understand the challenges I was facing. When I named them as injustices, I was inspired to work towards change. Since that moment in 1994 I have been in the struggle alongside my community in the Willamette Valley in hopes of overcoming the "-isms" that have been imposed on us.

MRG has been a key supporter of our work through their backing of CAPACES Leadership Institute, where I am working to redefine my identity and provide training and support to our community in Woodburn and throughout Oregon. At the institute we are conducting program evaluation and sharing our leadership development nationally. We are also launching RE-TURNO, a program that inculcates political consciousness in our youth leaders.

MRG allows us to be ourselves without fear. We share the same values and stick together when controversial issues arise because el pueblo unido jamás será vencido/the people united will never be divided.

This is just the beginning...

Hannah Sohl on building a movement for climate justice.

I grew up in the Rogue Valley and have always appreciated the importance of clean rivers in our thriving communities.

After college, I traveled to British Columbia where Shell Oil was trying to develop a fracking operation, but was stopped by a diverse coalition working to protect their community's environment, economy, and culture. When I came back to Oregon, I saw the same thing: out-of-state corporations putting their profits ahead of the wellbeing of Rogue Valley communities. But it doesn't have to be that way!

In 2013, I got together with my community to create an art installation we took to Salem to highlight the impact of climate change and the need for action. After that initial event, we kept bringing people together, kept elevating climate change as a critical issue, kept working to activate Southern Oregonians. Every day it felt like there was more work to do, so we launched Rogue Climate to build on the forward momentum.

We'd only launched Rogue Climate when we got our first grant from MRG! Getting funding from MRG was the tipping point that allowed us to secure more funding partners, and build a strong movement for climate justice.

And this is just the beginning.

Community is what brings me to this work.

The Asian Pacific American Network of Oregon (APANO) emphasizes community organizing and leadership development in advancing social justice for Oregon's fast growing Asian Pacific Islander population. We empower our leaders to be strong advocates for themselves and their communities.

MRG funding helped us jumpstart much of our work. With MRG's support for our Asian Pacific Parent Leadership Empowerment (APPLE) initiative, we worked alongside the Vietnamese community to create the state's first Vietnamese dual language immersion program. Thanks to the success of this initiative, we received support from larger funders like the Kaiser Permanente Community Fund and the Gates Foundation and contracts with Portland Public Schools. With this success APANO is now working to pay it forward.

By developing APANO chapters throughout the state, and using our experience and partnerships, we hope to support growing organizations to build a strong network of API groups across Oregon.

Even though we have graduated from MRG's General Fund Program, we are honored to continue to work alongside them to grow the social justice movement.

APANO is now working to pay it forward...

Duncan Hwang on how experienced organizations can support emerging groups.

I give because I know that time is not money...

Linda Reymers on her history with MRG as a donor, volunteer, and activist.

I have been a part of the MRG community for much of its forty years.

I have been a grantee, grantmaker, donor, and grants program director. Although I appreciate the opportunity to volunteer my time with MRG and its grantees, I donate because I know that time is not money.

I give because MRG does things differently. They fund groups that are often unlikely to receive traditional funding, and confidently support emerging groups and issues through their activist-led grantmaking.

By bringing together activists from a wide range of issues and communities they are able to share the movement's breadth and momentum, a sense that is difficult to experience from any one community's vantage point.

I have stayed involved with MRG over the years because of the dynamism of the organization. MRG consistently increases the number of grants given and the amount of dollars awarded, while implementing innovative new strategies.

It's been wonderful to witness MRG's growth and development first hand. I love how I can now go to MRG events and not know everyone there. There's a whole new generation of activists joining those of us who have been around the block, creating vital intergenerational exchange and an ever-growing community.

I like giving through my MRG donor-advised fund.

It gives me the time and privacy to do research on where I want to give.

> DA Fund Donor

MRG's donor-advised funds allow donors to deepen and widen the impact of our vision and values by supporting specific social change organizations throughout the U.S. Last year, DA Fund donors designated over $230,000 to create a more just and joyful world. Donor anonymity is assured and grants are monitored. MRG staff is also available to provide donors with background information on specific organizations or interest areas.
